1 Gus

Rose Stanway walked slowly and carefully to the door and opened it. She smiled as she looked up at her favourite neighbour, young Gus Banks.

‘Gus! Come in, love, and have a cup of tea – I’ve just made some.’

‘I can’t stop, Rose, but thanks anyway,’ the boy said apologetically*. ‘My mum wants to know if you need anything from the shops – we’re going to town this afternoon in the car.’

‘No thanks, Gus, but wait a minute,’ said Rose with a wink*. ‘I’ve got something for your mother.’

Rose went to the kitchen and came back with a jar* of dark red jam.

‘I made this with the raspberries* you picked* for me last week,’ Rose explained. ‘It tastes lovely with some nice, fresh bread. Ask your mother to buy some when you’re in town. This is one of my best jams.’

‘You always say that, Rose,’ Gus smiled. ‘And your jam is always brilliant. I’ll tell Mum but I’ll have a taste* first. Thanks.’

Rose smiled and watched Gus run back into his house, his brown hair falling down his neck and his legs too long for his trousers again. He was a nice boy – just like his father, bless his soul*. Just like his poor father.
